ELECTION CONTEST HEARING

LESS THAN HALF SUMMONED WITNESSES ARE HEARD.

Several Witnesses Give a Touch of Comedy to the Hearing of Little Serious Result.

The taking of testimony of witnesses on the part of the present congressional representative, A. R. Brodbeck, in the contest he is making to the election of C. Wm. Beales, came to an unexpected termination Wednesday afternoon when Attorney H. O. Ruby announced that the hearing was concluded until such date of which notice would be given. Not half the witnesses subpoenaed had been heard, but they were all excused and paid off. As Mr. Brodbeck must conclude the hearing of his testimony by Feb. 16, and must subpoena witnesses by giving five days notice, there will be but a week during which any further testimony can be taken.

There were five days of testimony taking, Thursday, Friday and Saturday of last week at York, and Tuesday and Wednesday at Gettysburg. John A. Stover and Samuel B. Meisenhelder, of York, were the Notaries before whom the testimony was taken. H. O. Ruby of York, has represented Mr. Brodbeck at all the hearings. Jerre S. Black, Charles Reider, J. Donald Swope, D. P. McPherson and S. S. Lewis represented Mr. Beales at the York, and the three last named at the Gettysburg hearing.

The taking of the testimony had many elements of a comedy. The wrangling of the attorneys repeatedly demonstrated that the feelings of the audience were with Mr. Beales. Counsel examining witnesses had made no previous inquiry of many and the calling of them simply killed time, and little or nothing that was material developed. In many cases the witnesses were unwilling and answers were received that surprised the questioner, and proved more embarrassing than helpful.

The testimony on Tuesday began with Joseph Gailbraith and Otis Baughman, of allegations about the conduct of the 1914 election in the Third Ward, which were denied by J. J. Martin, Moses E. Bair, Wm. D. Gilbert and George G. Sionaker. Dr. H. M. Hartman was asked to tell a lot of irrelevant matter. Leander Martin played the leading part in the comedy feature of the day, his replies drawing shouts of laughter, a sample being when Mr. Ruby asked, "You never refuse a drink, do you?" and Martin replied, "What do you mean, are you going to try me now?"

On Wednesday morning Harvey D. Bream, Harry Bumbaugh, Frank Penn, Robt. C. Miller, Prof. J. Louis Sowers, Wm. F. Weaver and Wm. A. Taughinbaugh testified, the facts of materiality developed being the payment of taxes upon orders.

Wednesday afternoon the witnesses were George Aughinbaugh, Nicholas Redding, J. H. Weikert, Dr. E. H. Markley and Chas. H. Wilson, Bruce Tonsil and Dave Wilson, the latter two being the commedians. Dr. E. H. Markley, with much emphasis, explained how he had driven his automobile all of election day in the interests of Mr. Beales, going to and from the election polls in the town and Cumberland township, and that he had received various written messages that day from Mr. Beales where he should go and that he never used liquor himself nor had given it to any one either on election day or at any other time.

County Detective Chas. H. Wilson detailed that at the instance of the attorneys, J. Donald Swope and D. P. McPherson, Esqs., he had made information against A. R. Brodbeck for violation of the federal statute forbidding the payment of money for political purposes to one in the employ of the Government. It alleged that the expense account filed by Mr. Brodbeck shows payment of money to an employee of the Hanover Post Office.

It is easy to believe the remark attributed to Mr. Brodbeck that he had been misinformed as to the facts and condition of the Gettysburg situation, as the explanation of concluding the hearing here when but half of the witnesses in attendance had been heard.

The absence of any leading Democratic lawyers of York in this county as counsel for the contestant at these hearings would indicate an inability to get such parties to stand sponsor for the contest, or that the contest had been ably advised. It has certainly been slow direct pay in the examination of witnesses without any previous knowledge of what they would or could swear or know.

After Clarence Geesey, the private secretary of Congressman Brodbeck, stated in the Prothonotary's office in the presence of Prothonotary Mehring and a number of other persons that notwithstanding he was a very busy man, yet the boys of York were pushing him to become a candidate for congress next year, comment was heard here whether it was possible Geesey was helping Brodbeck to make a political mistake in making the contest in order to take advantage of it.

Guessing as to what the contest actually means is but a natural mental attitude in view of what has developed and how it has been developed.

MUNICIPAL PLANT DEAD

TOWN COUNCIL AT FEBRUARY MEETING DID THE KILLING.

New Contract for Lighting Town Concluded Which, it is Said, Will Make Big Saving.

The municipal light plant is dead and its chief councilman promoter did not do his pet project so much honor as to attend the obsequies when it was killed and buried by the Town Council at the February meeting last Tuesday. The Light Committee, composed of Councilmen Stock, Baughman and Trostle, had been instructed to report to the meeting a tentative contract with the light company. The first two were not present and to Councilman Trostle's objections to a contract with the Light Company Councilman Keith commented that the unfriendliness of the Light Committee to the Light Company was preventing the town from getting a better light bargain, which was the objective point Council desired to reach.

A communication between the Light Committee and Light Company was then presented. The Light Committee on Jan 15, in writing, notified the Light Company to substitute Tungsten lights for all arc lights with the exception of ten arcs and to use its own judgment as to which ten should remain in use, all other lights to be replaced by Tungsten lights.

The Light Company replied to the Town Council that the contract for lighting the town expired Aug. 20, 1914, which permitted reduction of arcs to ten lights. Since expiration of contract the lights had been furnished on a 30 day basis and that it would cost several hundred dollars to reduce arcs to ten and borough could then give 30 days notice to remove the substituted lights. The Council was asked to choose a schedule of those previously submitted and enter into a five year contract, when all changes would be made as Council might desire.

A contract ordinance was then presented and was passed and will be found in another column. Under it all arc lights will be replaced. The arc light is an out-of-date lamp, the modern way being by Tungstens and nitrogen filled lamps which will be used, and changes will be made so that new lighting will start March 1st.

Councilman Gilbert submitted a plan of the new lights, by which there would be more lamps than at present and the total cost would not be $1900 making at saving in light bill of over $1000. It is certainly to be hoped that such will be the outcome of the extended fight over a municipal plant and new light contract.

The borough tax rate was fixed at the same figure as last year, 7 mills general and 2 1-2 mills special.

Improvements at Engine House asked for by Fire Chief Plank were referred to Property Committee to report upon at next meeting.

Alley bridges reported in bad repair by Councilman Gilbert were ordered fixed, using cement and iron.

East Berlin Farmers' Institute.

Farmers' Institute met in the P. O. S. of A. Hall at East Berlin Feb. 1st, 1915, at 1.30 p. m. The meeting was called to order by the chairman, A. I. Weidner. Rev. W. H. Miller offered prayer. The address of welcome was deferred until the evening session. The first topic of the afternoon was then taken up, "Lime: How, When and For What to Use It." It was discussed by Wm. M. Patton, of Mosgrove, Pa. He spoke very forcibly on using lime to raise clover. The time to use it is in the fall when you plow for fall seeding. The topic was fully discussed, after which it was open for questions. One of the questions was "With good steer manure and lime will I have good results without fertilizer." The question was answered by Mr. Patton in the affirmative.

The next topic was then taken up by Mr. J. T. Campbell, of Hartstown, Pa., "Poultry, Care and Feeding and Chicks." Mr Campbell said you should first select a strong and vigorous breed of chickens, then give them plenty of feed, using corn principally for hatching puposes. For incubator hatching the eggs should not be more than three days old. If older than that the hen should do the hatching. The proper temperature the first few days is more important than the feed. When you do feed have your regular time, about five times a day.

Mr. Vern F. Struble, of Athens, Pa., then made a few remarks on "Marketing Dairy Products," saying the farmer does not get enough for his products at the present day. Institute adjourned to meet at 7 o'clock.

MONDAY EVENING SESSION.

Institute was called to order by the chairman, Mr. Weidner, after which the Young Men's Chorus of East Berlin sang several selections which were enjoyed by all present. Prof. Bucher of the East Berlin High School made the address of welcome, which was responded to by Mr. Patton. The first topic for the evening discussed was by Mr. Vern F. Struble, "Does the Farmer Need to Keep Posted." Mr. Struble said the farmer needs to keep posted along his line as well as the merchant or any other business man.

Mr. McClain, a member of the board of farm advisors, spoke a few words on the drainage question. He told how better crops could be raised in Adams county if the land was properly drained. At this time the Institute was again favored with music from the Young Men's Chorus, which was greatly appreciated. Mr. J. T. Campbell gave an illustrated lecture on "How Nature Makes Soil." Mr. Campbell's pictures were very good and his lecture was highly instructive. This closed the evening session.

TUESDAY MORNING, 9 A. M.

Institute was opened by the chairman. The first topic, "Potato Growing for Profit (On Small Scale)," was discussed by Mr. Patton. First the soil should be put in proper condition and the best soil on the farm should be selected. Potatoes for seeding should be kept in an underground cellar. He also told how to cut the potato to the best advantage. To keep the potato from getting scabby you should dip the cut potatoes in a solution of formaldehyde, drain them and sprinkle with powdered sulphur. After some further discussion the next topic was taken up. "Methods of Improving Our Dairy," by Vern T. Struble. He told of the best feed to use for dairy feeding and what breed to have for the most milk. How to start calves, also to test your cows. Weigh their milk and if they do not come up to the standard get rid of them. He also spoke more of "Marketing Dairy Products." Institute adjourned to meet at 1 30 p. m.

TUESDAY AFTERNOON 1 30 P. M.

Institute was opened by the Chairman. The first topic for discussion was Poultry, "Foods and Feeding", discussed by Mr. Campbell. He told of the different breeds of chicken that bring the best results and the best food adapted to the different breeds. Corn is the best food for the hen, but it should be alternated with other grains, beefscraps, crushed bones, and greens. He said the average hen lays about 72 eggs in a year. Questions were then asked and answered by the speaker, after which the next topic was taken up, "Making the Old Orchard Pay," was discussed by Mr. Struble. The first thing you must do to your trees is to prune them. When you cut a limb, cut it close to the stem of the tree then paint it with White Lead. Spray your trees four times a year, but not in blossoming time, with Lime and Sulphur. Fertilize the trees with stable manure whenever you see the trees are not thriving mulch and cultivate them.

The next topic for the afternoon was discussed by Mr. Patton, "The Possibilities of Alfalfa and How to Grow it." Alfalfa is a good thing to raise. Any animal will eat it and will thrive on it, it is also good for the soil. After the Alfalfa root is in the ground you can grow more potatoes and other grain or vegetable. You should not sow Alfalfa too early, first lime your soil then raise rye or corn, then sow Alfalfa, and after you have a good growth of Alfalfa you need not lime as often. Here Mr. McClain gave a short talk on drainage. The meeting then adjourned to meet at 7 P. M.

EVENING SESSION

The last session of the institute was called to order by the Chairman. The institute was again favored with music by the "Young Men's Chorus," and a solo by Prof. Bucher, which was highly appreciated by the institute.

Mr. C. G. McClain a member of the board of farm Advisers spoke on the water system, giving the approximate cost of bringing the water from a distance to the buildings.

Mr. Wm. Patton then addressed the institute upon the subject, "The Little Red Schoolhouse as I knew it." Mr. Patton gave a vivid description of the Little Red School House of many years ago, which at times was very humorous. His lecture was well delivered. The Young Men's Chorus again sang two selections with Maxton Darone as the soloist. The last topic for the session was, "The Farm of Life," discussed by Mr J. T. Campbell. Mr. Campbell's address was excellent. Among the good things he said was to give the boys and girls on the farm a chance. This closed the institute for East Berlin. Considering the inclement weather the sessions were well attended.

The Biglerville Show's Future.

The Biglerville Agriculture, Horticultural and Poultry Association at a meeting of stockholders last Saturday decided to hold the next show in Biglerville. The show had not received the support and attendance from Biglerville and vicinity last December as upon previous exhibitions and members of the association had approached Gettysburg people with the proposition that unpaid stock be subscribed and paid by citizens of this place on the condition that the name be changed to Adams County and with the further condition that the board should have the right to hold the show in any town in the county, as might be demonstrated from year to year as being for the best interests of the show.

Twelve stockholders attended the meeting and G. W. Koser had proxies from twenty other stockholders and two resolutions carried, one that the next show be held in Biglerville and the other if another exhibit is deemed unwise the equipment be disposed of and the charter annulled. The stock of the association was 102 shares of $10 each. About half of the stock has been paid for. The equipment is worth $738.11. Having been paid by the stock and profits of other years. The statement of the last show indicated a balance of $5.95 in the treasury and unpaid equipment bills of $131.41.

Following the passage of the two resolutions, O. C. Rice, the secretary, who has been untiring in his efforts to promote the association and make the annual exhibit a success, with C. E. Raffensperger withdrew as members of the board of directors. Mr. Koser then voting his proxies named the following board of directors: S. G. Bigham, U. S. Klinefelter, C. E. Deatrick, H. U. Walter, E. P. Garretson, Curtis Peters, N. C. Thomas, C. L. Longsdorf, W. E. Kapp, O. C. Rice, D. A. Washinger, G. H. Knouse, D. C. Jacobs, C. E. Raffensperger, M. L. Frame, A. E. Rice, and G. W. Koser. These directors will meet and elect their officers.

Reasons for Later Deer Season.

Secretary Kalbfuss of the State Board of Game Commissioners is in favor of a later open season for shooting deer than from Nov. 10th to Nov. 25th as fixed by the last game act and gives the following scientific facts for his opinion:

"The killing of mature bucks at the time fixed by the law for such killing will have little to do with the increase or failure to increase of deer in this State. In the first place, it is a fact beyond question that every male deer according to his physical strength maintains a harem, gathering under his control and domain as many does as he can possibly secure, to the number of eight or ten, or sometimes even twenty, this buck fighting continuously in defense of his harem, driving other bucks from the neighborhood and preventing them in any way from associating with the does under his control. This buck is able to serve every one of the does under his control during the rutting season, and he unquestionably does serve them.

"A deer, both male and female, reaches the age of puberty at about fifteen month. A young deer born in May of 1913 will reach the age of puberty at about the latter part of July or early in August, 1914. This male will be fully able to serve does during the rutting season following July or August, 1914. Under the present law a male deer before he can be killed must have horns extending above the hair at least two inches. This condition insures his being beyond the age of puberty. The rutting season of deer in Pennsylvania begins with the light of the moon in October and extends to perhaps the first of December. The height of the season is past about November 15, so that every male deer in the woods of sufficient age to be killed will have from the middle of October to the opening of the coming season in which he may perform the function intended by nature.

"Considering these very questions and the necessity for giving bucks a longer time, the legislature will be asked during the present session to make the opening of the deer season ten days or more later than at the present time. There is no doubt whatever but that deer have increased in Pennsylvania under the provisions of this law forbidding the killing of any male deer, this even in the face of the fact that no closed term of years has been declared in Pennsylvania."

Orrtanna Co. Assigns.

Charles Emory Starner, trading as the Standard Mill Work Company, of Orrtanna, has made an assignment for the benefit of creditors to E. F. Strasbaugh of Hamiltonban township.

Cast for Firemen's Show.

The cast for "Incog," the Firemen's benefit show at Walker's Theatre on Feb. 11th, has been announced and includes some of the town's best talent. Richard Mishler, Martin McSherry, Mary Ramer, Mrs. R. H. Bushman, Albin McSherry, Earl Stallsmith, Wilbur Stallsmith, W. Ernest Ziegler, Grace Ramer and Lucy Redding. The parts of the "twins" will likely be taken by W. Ernest Ziegler, Earl Stallsmith and Albin McSherry.

Strength of Insects.

The insects are provided with muscles of enormous power as compared with men. If a fly be held by the wings it can pick up and carry a match, and this is as if a man were able to pick up a beam twenty-eight feet long and fifteen and one-half inches square.

An ordinary little ant can pull eight matches on rollers, which would equal a load of 320 beams the size of a man when its weight is compared with that of a horse.

The flea jumps 200 times its own height, which is about the same as if a man were to jump over the nearly thousand foot mark Eiffel tower.

An oyster opposes being opened by exerting a force of over thirty pounds, and for a man to show the same power he would have to take up eighty large locomotives and bear them Atlas-like upon his shoulders.

From a purely physical point of view man is the weakest of animals. It is only by the use of his mind and the application of the laws of mechanics in the machinery he has invented that he has been able to dominate the world.—Boston Herald.

The Yosemite.

The best authorities have now agreed upon the spelling of Yosemite as recorded in Hodge's "Handbook of the American Indians." The following forms have been employed in various publications: Oosemite, Oosoomite, Sosemiteiz, Sosemity, Yaseemne, Yoamity, Yohamite, Yosahmitis, Yosemate, Yosemetos, Yosemery, Yosimities and Yosoomite. It never was used by the Indians as the name of the valley, for the Awani division of the Miwok tribe, who made their home in the valley, called their principal village and the whole valley by their name Awani. The name Yosemite may have derived from the Awani village of Lesamaiti, but Powers regards it as a distortion of the Miwok word uzumaiti, meaning grizzly bear.—New York Sun.

The Squirrel.

Innocent in all his ways, harmless in his food, playful as a kitten, but without cruelty, and surpassing the fantastic dexterity of the monkey, with the grace and brightness of a bird, the little dark eyed miracle of the forest glances from branch to branch, more like a sunbeam than a living creature. It leaps and darts and twines where it will. A chamois is slow to it and a panther clumsy. Grotesque as a gnome, gentle as a fairy, delicate as the silken plumes of the rush, beautiful and strong like the spiral of a fern, it haunts you, listens for you, hides from you, looks for you, loves you, as if the angel that walks with your children had made it himself for a heavenly plaything.—John Ruskin.

Palace of the Popes.

The Vatican is the papal palace and derives its name from the hill on which it stands, the Mons Vaticanus, one of the seven hills of Rome. It is a collection of magnificent buildings, which occupy a space of 1,151 by 767 feet. The most ancient of the present structures dates from the time of Nicholas V., about 1447. The various popes from time to time added new buildings, in which are many works of art of a historical character. The Sistine chapel, one of the Vatican edifices, contains Michelangelo's first masterpiece in painting, "The Last Judgment." The Pauline chapel possesses Michelangelo's frescoes of "The Conversion of St. Paul" and "The Crucifixion of St. Peter."

Troops and Winter.

When Napoleon went to Moscow and back it was found that the French soldiers stood the intense cold better than the Poles and north Germans. It is quite wrong, by the way, to suppose, as is often done, that that fatal winter set in early with exceptional severity. Napoleon invented that explanation to palliate the disaster into which he plunged his army. But the autumn was so exceptionally mild that the peasants believed that God was favoring Napoleon, and the first snowstorm did not come until Nov. 6, an unusually late arrival.

Decorations For Women.

There are few decorations for women in Europe, the most ancient order coming from the Austrian throne. It is the decoration of the Star and Crucifix and is given to women of high rank. Another is the Luisen, founded in memory of the beautiful queen of Prussia whom Napoleon insulted. This order is given to all classes of women who subject themselves to any great self sacrifice.

To Clean Watch Chains.

Gold or silver watch chains can be cleaned with a very excellent result, no matter whether they be matt or polished, by laying them for a few seconds in pure aqua ammonia. They are then rinsed in alcohol and finally shaken in clean sawdust free from sand.—Modern Herald.

Naval Mines.

The first recorded appearance of mines as instruments of naval warfare was at the siege of Antwerp in 1585, when they were employed by the Dutch against the Spaniards.

Took the Hint.

A wearied young lady hastened the departure of a tedious caller by remarking as she looked out of the window, "I think we are going to have a beautiful sunrise."

Mr Strayer boards with the family of Calvin Deardorff. He was searching for a match early Saturday morning to light a lamp on his bureau when he fell down the steps. Dr. E. A. Miller attended the injured man.

Stevens in Trouble.

Harry Stevens of Heidlersburg, is in more trouble in York county. G. W. A. Hankey, of York, alleges Stevens stole $3 worth of corn and Charles Sherfy, a restaurant keeper of that city, charges him with the theft of a pair of boots valued at $2.50.

Cost of Foot and Mouth Disease.

During the present epidemic of aphthos fever among the cattle in the York and Adams county districts, the cost to the State and federal governments will be about $75,000, according to figures of the appraisements compiled at the local headquarters of the inspectors at Spring Grove.

Since the beginning of the epidemic of foot and mouth disease last October, 58 herds were condemned and put to death in this district. In round numbers the head of cattle killed will be 2,000. Local inspectors condemned 53 herds for a total of 1,695 heads. Of this number 940 were cattle, 692 hogs, 62 sheep and one goat. The York county district was the heaviest loser, 39 herds being condemned and killed, while in Adams county there were 14 herds. The appraisement of the stock condemned and killed amounts to $60,260.52.

These figures do not include the cost of the disinfecting or replacing the lumber on quarantined premises, which costs on an average $150 to each farm. There has been canvassing among the farmers the past few days adjusting the losses sustained to property by the disinfecting. The state and federal departments will bear the appraised value as well as those of the condemned cattle. When a farm is visited Contractor Stambaugh makes an estimate as to the cost of restoring the stable to the condition it was prior to the disinfecting. His appraisement is accepted by the inspectors. The farmer is then allowed the amount to make repairs, if he so desires. If he does not accept the amount the work will be done by a contractor employed by the departments. With the exception of two, all the farmers of quarantined places have accepted the appraised value of the repairs to be made.

When the payments are made by the government to the farmers for the cattle killed, C. A. Snodgrass will be the recipient of the largest single voucher amounting to $4,614, the appraised value of 66 cattle, 18 hogs and 29 sheep killed on his farm. To date no payments have been made for condemned cattle, but money is now ready according to a statement from Washington saying:

Under the recent urgent deficiency act which was signed by the President on January 25, $2,500,000 is now available for the eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease. Up to January 1, 1915, the outbreak had cost the Federal Government a total of $2,129,138.04. Of this sum $1,840,328.99 represents the Federal Government's share of the expense of slaughtering affected herds and reimbursing the owners for their loss, of which the Government pays half and the individual States the remainder. The figures show that exclusive of the work in January 101,176 animals have been slaughtered. Of these 46,268 were cattle, 47,735 swine.

The money now at the disposal of the Department of Agriculture, will, it is believed, aid the campaign against the pestilence by enabling the Government to make prompt payment to all owners of infected herds, and thus minimize the reluctance of farmers to have their stock slaughtered.

Could you rebuild the civilization in which you live?

This is the proposition put before you in our new serial—

The Scarlet Plague

By JACK LONDON

One of the Best Stories Ever Written by This Popular Author

THE SCARLET PLAGUE strips from man the glamour of his civilized state and carries him back to the days of semi-barbarism.

The devastating sweep of an epidemic across the American continent takes with it the millions of people and every vestige of civilization. Only a handful of people remain between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. Upon them devolves the task of again founding the race and rebuilding the Twentieth Century civilization.

If you were one of these people, what would you do? Could you rebuild the civilization you enjoy today, or would you sink into aboriginal barbarity?

HOW FARMS CONTRIBUTE

TO THE COMFORT AND LIVING OF THE FARMER AND FAMILY

The Returns and Restraints the Environment of the Famer Continually Places Upon Him.

(Communicated)

A mistaken impression prevails concerning the wealth derived from Farms.

The recent rise in the price of Wheat and Flour will be found to have been caused by over-estimation of the crops raised in 1914.

Allusion is sometimes made to a supposed Farmers Trust withholding grain from Market, until higher prices shall be offered. There exists no such combination.

The bulk of the grain raised in 1914 was marketed as early as possible by the Farmers, for they had urgent need of the money, although they believed prices would advance, they had to let the wheat go at about 90 cents per bushel; the corn and rye at about 60 cents, and the oats at 35 to 40.

The merchants and speculators also believe that prices would advance. Perhaps, they are governed by a syndicate which regulates the prices to be offered in the several settlements. Such a combination effect is encouraged by certain organizations, as the Government Bureau, Board of Trade, etc. They are merely in accord with one another in beat-treading the market prices. They all know the farmer must sell, and the lower the price to the farmer, the greater the profit to themselves. This is business, and the merchants and speculators know it.

The few fortunate farmers who have withheld their grain from market, may now obtain $1.40 to $1.50 per bushel for wheat, 75 to 80 cents for rye and corn, and 50 cents for oats. If they delay longer, they will get more. This advance comes about through no combination of the farmers. The experts over-estimated the supply, and the War in Europe creates an extraordinary demand.

Farmers depend upon full yield of the crops mentioned for ready money to pay their help, taxes, interest and other unavoidable charges. They are kept under continual restraint from incurring unnecessary obligations, and rely upon the sale of poultry and dairy products for living and incidental expenses, improved seeds and farm implements.

The produce derived from the farm and applied to the living expenses of the farmer and his family, and the maintenance of the stock, include supplies of wheat to be taken to the Mill and made into flour for the family, with the outer shell of bran, and the coarser portion, as middlings, to be used as food for the animals. Considerable portions of the rye, oats and corn must also be retained as feed for the horses, cows, pigs, sheep and poultry.

Charges of extravagance and waste in the use of these cereals are often well founded. The use of rye for bread, and other purposes in the farmer's family is not so common now, as in former generations, but the use of corn continues. Corn is used for mush, bread, cakes, muffins and scrapel. The farmer receives less than two cents a pound for these cereals, which when subjected to the process of preparation for breakfast foods, are returned to him in packages of ten or twelve ounces, for which he must pay 10 or 15 cents per package.

In former days, much of the rye and corn were converted by local distilleries into whiskey, and enough came back to the farm in liquid form. The privilege of distilling is now denied to farmers, who are not, however, ignorant of the fact that no conversion they could make of their farm-products would be more profitable.

Likewise, many of our farmers raise tobacco, and by using some of it, they might reduce their living expenses, but they know better. We do not forget that shortly after the Civil War one of our most worthy and esteemed farmers was arrested and heavily fined for preparing and chewing tobacco, raised by himself. They may raise the tobacco, but they dare not crush the leaves into snuff, nor roll them into cigars for these processes are not farming, but manufacturing, and, like distilling, require Government License.

One of the principal faults to be found with farmers is that they do not raise enough of anything, and do not profitably market what they raise, and can spare. They do not raise enough potatoes, and even some of their own seed potatoes, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

The SCARLET PLAGUE

By JACK LONDON

COPYRIGHT 1914 BY McCLURE NEWSPAPER SYNDICATE

"Wearied by the unusual exercise of continual walking, that night I slept heavily. Canfield and Parsons, my last companions, were dead of the plague. Of the four hundred that sought shelter in the Chemistry building, and of the forty-seven that began the march, I alone remained—I and the Shetland pony. Why this should be so there is no explaining. I did not catch the plague, that is all. I was immune. I was merely the one lucky man in a million—just as every survivor was one in a million, or, rather, in several millions, for the proportion was at least that.

The Miscreant Who Had Set Fire to It Staggered Down the Steps.

"For two days I sheltered in a pleasant grove where there had been no deaths. In those days, while badly depressed and believing that my turn would come at any moment, nevertheless I rested and recuperated. So did the pony. And on the third day, putting what small store of tinned provisions I possessed on the pony's back, I started on across a very lonely land. Not a live man, woman or child did I encounter, though the dead were everywhere. Food, however, was abundant. The land then was not as it is now. It was all cleared of trees and brush, and it was cultivated. The food for millions of mouths was growing, ripening and going to waste. From the fields and orchards I gathered vegetables, fruits and berries. Around the deserted farmhouses I got eggs and caught chickens. And frequently I found supplies of tinned provisions in the storerooms.

"A strange thing was what was taking place with all the domestic animals. The chickens and ducks were the first to be destroyed, while the pigs were the first to go wild, followed by the cats. Nor were the dogs long in adapting themselves to the changed conditions. There was a veritable plague of dogs. They devoured the corpses, barked and howled during the nights, and in the daytime slunk about in the distance. As the time went by I noticed a change in their behavior. At first they were apart from one another, very suspicious and very prone to fight, but after a not very long while they began to come together and run in packs. The dog, you see, always was a social animal, and this was true before ever he came to be domesticated by man. In the last days of the world, before the plague, there were many, many very different kinds of dogs—dogs without hair and dogs with warm fur, dogs so small that they would make scarcely a mouthful for other dogs that were as large as mountain lions. Well, all the small dogs, and the weak types, were killed by their fellows. Also, the very large ones were not adapted for the wild life and bred out. As a result the many different kinds of dogs disappeared, and there remained only, running in packs, the medium-sized wolfish dogs that you know today.

"The horses also went wild and all the fine breeds we had degenerated into the small mustang you know today. The cows likewise went wild, as did the pigeons and the sheep. And that a few of the chickens survived you know yourself. But the wild chicken of today is quite a different thing from the chickens we had in those days."

CHAPTER IV.

Beginning of Life Anew.

"But I must go on with my story. I traveled through a deserted land. As the time went by I began to yearn more and more for human beings. But I never found one, and I grew lonelier and lonelier. I crossed Livermore valley and the mountains between it and the great valley of the San Joaquin. You have never seen that valley, but it is very large and it is the home of the wild horse. There are great droves there, thousands and tens of thousands. I revisited it thirty years after, so I know. You think there are lots of wild horses down here in the coast valleys, but they are as nothing compared with those of the San Joaquin. Strange to say, the cows, when they went wild, went back into the lower mountains. Evidently they were better able to protect themselves there.

"In the country districts the ghouls and prowlers had been less in evidence, for I found many villages and towns untouched by fire. But they were filled by the pestilential dead, and I passed by without exploring them. It was near Lathrop that, out of my loneliness, I picked up a pair of collie dogs that were so newly free that they were urgently willing to return to their allegiance to man. These collies accompanied me for many years, and the strains of them are in these very dogs there that you boys have today. But in sixty years the collie strain has worked out. Those brutes are more like domesticated wolves than anything else."

Hare-Lip rose to his feet, glanced to see that the goats were safe, and looked at the sun's position in the afternoon sky, advertising impatience at the prolixity of the old man's tale. Urged to hurry by Edwin, Ganser went on:

"There is little more to tell. With my two dogs and my pony, and riding a horse I had managed to capture, I crossed the San Joaquin and went on to a wonderful valley in the Sierras called Yosemite. In the great hotel there I found a prodigious supply of tinned provisions. The pasture was abundant, as was the game, and the river that ran through the valley was full of trout. I remained there three years in an utter loneliness that none but a man who has once been highly civilized can understand. Then I could stand it no more. I felt that I was going crazy. Like the dog, I was a social animal and needed my kind. I reasoned that since I had survived the plague, there was a possibility that others had survived. Also, I reasoned that after three years the plague germs must all be gone and the land be clean again.

"With my horse and dogs and pony, I set out. Again I crossed the San Joaquin valley, the mountains beyond, and came down into Livermore valley. The change in those three years was amazing. All the land had been splendidly tilled, and now I could scarcely recognize it, such was the sea of rank vegetation that had overrun the agricultural handiwork of man. You see, the wheat, the vegetables, and orchard trees had always been cared for and nursed by man, so that they were soft and tender. The weeds and wild bushes and such things, on the contrary, had always been fought by man, so that they were tough and resistant. As a result, when the hand of man was removed the wild vegetation smothered and destroyed practically all the domesticated vegetation. The coyotes were greatly increased, and it was at this time that I first encountered wolves, straying in twos and threes and small packs, down from the wild regions where they had always persisted.

"It was at Lake Temescal, not far from the one-time city of Oakland, that I came upon the first live human being. Oh, my grandsons, how can I describe to you my emotions, when, astride my horse and dropping down the hillside to the lake, I saw the smoke of a campfire rising through the trees. Almost did my heart stop beating. I felt that I was going crazy. Then I heard the cry of a babe—a human babe. And dogs barked and my dogs answered. I did not know but that I was the one human alive in the whole world. It could not be true that there were others—smoke, and the cry of a babe.

"Emerging on the lake, there, before my eyes, not a hundred yards away, I saw a man, a large man. He was standing on an outjutting rock and fishing. I was overcome. I stopped my horse. I tried to call out, but could not. I waved my hand. It seemed to me that the man looked at me, but he did not appear to wave. Then I laid my hand on my arms there in the saddle. I was afraid to look again, for I knew it was an hallucination, and I knew that if I looked the man would be gone. And so precious was the hallucination that I wanted it to persist yet a little while. I knew, too, that as long as I did not look it would persist.

"Thus I remained, until I heard my dogs snarling, and man's voice. What do you think the voice said? I will tell you. It said: "Where in hell did you come from?"

"Those were the words, the exact words. That was what your grandfather said to me, Hare-Lip, when he greeted me there on the shore of Lake Temescal fifty-seven years ago. And they were the most ineffable words I have ever heard. I opened my eyes, and there he stood before me, a large, dark, hairy man, heavy jawed, slant browed, fierce eyed. How I got off my horse I do not know. But it seemed that the next I knew I was clasping his hand with both of mine and crying. I would have embraced him, but he was ever a narrow-minded, suspicious man, and he drew away from me. Yet did I cling to his hand and cry."

With My Horse and Dogs and Pony I Set Out.

Granser's voice faltered and broke at the recollection, and the weak tears streamed down his cheeks while the boys looked on and giggled.

"Yet did I cry," he continued, "and desire to embrace him, though the Chauffeur was a brute, a perfect brute—the most abhorrent man I have ever known. His name was . . . strange, how I have forgotten his name. Everybody called him Chauffeur—it was the name of his occupation, and it stuck. That is how, to this day, the tribe he founded is called the Chauffeur tribe.

"He was a violent, unjust man. Why the plague spared him I can never understand. It would seem, in spite of our old metaphysical notions about absolute justice, that there is no justice in the universe. Why did he live?—an iniquitous, moral monster, a blot on the face of nature, a cruel, relentless, bestial cheat as well. All he could talk about was motor cars, machinery, gasoline, and garage—and especially with huge delight, of his mean pilferings and sordid swindlings of the persons who had employed him in the days before the coming of the plague. And yet he was spared, while hundreds of millions, yea, billions, of better men were destroyed.

"I went on with him to his camp, and there I saw her. Vesta, the one woman. It was glorious and . . . pitiful. There she was, Vesta Van Warden, the young wife of John Van Warden, clad in rags, with marred and scarred and toil-calloused hands, bending over the campfire and doing scullion work—she, Vesta, who had been born to the purple of the greatest baronage of wealth the world had ever known. John Van Warden, her husband, worth one billion eight hundred millions, and president of the Board of Industrial Magnates, had been the ruler of America. Also, sitting on the Industrial Board of Control, he had been one of the seven men who ruled the world. And she herself had come of equally noble stock. Her father, Philip Saxon, had been President of the Board of Industrial Magnates up to the time of his death. This office was in process of becoming hereditary, and had Philip Saxon had a son that son would have succeeded him. But his only child was Vesta, the perfect flower of generations of the highest [illegible] this planet has ever [illegible] was not until the [illegible] Vesta [illegible] Van Warden [illegible] that Saxon initiated the latter as [illegible] successor. It was, I am sure, a [illegible] marriage. I have reason [illegible] that Vesta never really loved [illegible] husband in the mad, passionate way of which the poets used to sing. It was more like the marriages that obtained among crowned heads before they were displaced by the Magnates.

"And there she was, boiling fish chowder in a soot-covered pot, her glorious eyes inflamed by the acrid smoke of the open fire. Here was a sad story. She was the one survivor in a million, as I had been, as the Chauffeur had been. On a crowning eminence of the Alameda Hills, overlooking San Francisco Bay, Van Warden had built a vast summer palace. It was surrounded by a park of a thousand acres. When the plague broke out, Van Warden sent her there. Armed guards patrolled the boundaries of the park, and nothing entered in the way of provisions or even mail matter that was not first fumigated. And yet did the plague enter, killing the guards at their posts, the servants at their tasks, sweeping away the whole army of retainers—or, at least, all them who did not flee to die elsewhere. So it was that Vesta found herself the sole living person in the palace that had become a charnel house.

"Now, the Chauffeur had been one of the servants that ran away. Returning, two months afterward, he discovered Vesta in a little summer pavilion where there had been no deaths and where she had established herself. He was a brute. She was afraid, and she ran away and hid among the trees. That night, on foot, she fled into the mountains—she, whose tender feet and delicate body had never known the bruise of stones nor the scratch of briers. He followed, and that night he caught her. He struck her. Do you understand? He beat her with those terrible fists of his and made her his slave. It was she who had to gather the firewood, build the fires, cook and do all the degrading camp labor—she, who had never performed a menial act in her life. These things he compelled her to do, while he, a proper savage, elected to lie around camp and look on. He did nothing, absolutely nothing, except on occasion to hunt meat or catch fish."

"Good for Chauffeur," Hare-Lip commented in an understone to the other boys. "I remember him before he died. He was a corker. But he did things, and he made things go. You know, dad married his daughter, an' you ought to see the way he knocked the spots outa dad. The Chauffeur was a son of a gun. He made us kids stand around. Even when he was croakin' he reached out for me once an' laid my head open with that long stick he kept always beside him."

Hare-Lip rubbed his bullet head reminiscently, and the boys returned to the old man, who was maundering ecstatically about Vesta, the squaw of the founder of the Chauffeur tribe.

"And so I say to you that you cannot understand the awfulness of the situation. The Chauffeur was a servant, understand, a servant. And he cringed, with bowed head, to such as she. She was a lord of life, both by birth and by marriage. The destinies of millions such as he she carried in the hollow of her pink-white hand. And, in the days before the plague, the slightest contact with such as he would have been pollution. Oh, I have seen it. Once, I remember, there was a Mrs. Goldwin, wife of one of the great magnates. It was on a landing stage, just as she was embarking in her private dirigible, that she dropped her parasol. A servant picked it up and made the mistake of handing it to her—to her, one of the greatest royal ladies of the land! She shrank back, as though he were a leper, and indicated her secretary to receive it. Also, she ordered her secretary to ascertain the creature's name and to see that he was immediately discharged from service. And such a woman was Vesta Van Warden. And her the Chauffeur beat and made his slave.

"—Bill—that was it: Bill, the Chauffeur. That was his name. He was a wretched, primitive man, wholly devoid of the finer instincts and chivalrous promptings of a cultured soul. No, there is no absolute justice, for to him fell that wonder of womanhood, Vesta Van Warden. The grievousness of this you will never understand, my grandsons: for you are yourselves primitive little savages, unaware of aught else but savagery. Why should Vesta not have been mine? I was a man of culture and refinement, a professor in a great university. Even so, in the time before the plague, such was her exalted position, she would not have deigned to know that I existed. Mark, then, the abysmal degradation to which she fell at the hands of the Chauffeur. Nothing less than the destruction of all mankind had made it possible that I should know her, look in her eyes, converse with her, touch her hand—aye, and love her and know that her feelings toward me were very kindly. I have reason to believe that she, even she, would have loved me, there being no other man in the world except the Chauffeur. Why, when it destroyed eight billions of souls, did not the plague destroy just one more man, and that man the Chauffeur?

"Once, when the Chauffeur was away fishing, she begged me to kill him. With tears in her eyes she begged me to kill him. But he was a strong and violent man, and I was afraid. Afterward I talked with him. I offered him my horse, my pony, my dogs, all that I possessed, if he would give Vesta to me. And he grinned in my face and clubbed his head. He was very [illegible]. He said that in the old days he had been a servant, had been dirt under the feet of men like me and of women like Vesta, and that now he had the greatest lady in the land to be servant to him and cook his food and nurse his brats. 'You had your day before the plague,' he said; 'but this is my day, and a damned good day it is. I wouldn't trade back to the old times for anything.' Such words he spoke, but they are not his words. He was a vulgar, low-minded man, and vile oaths fell continually from his lips.

Memoirs of Napoleon

In Three Volumes

The personal reminiscences of Baron de Méneval, for thirteen years private secretary to Napoleon Bonaparte, bring out, as no history can, many enlightening and interesting side lights on the character of that greatest of leaders. De Méneval's descriptions have the piquancy and interest possible only because he was an actual eye-witness of the scenes and incidents of which he writes. Their reliability and historical interest can be judged by the fact that the very conservative French Academy publicly recommends them.

Completion of the

NEMO Self-Reducing IDEA

For seventeen years past, millions of women have owed their health, vigor and symmetry largely to Nemo Self-Reducing Corsets.

A strong statement; but true, BECAUSE---

The Nemo Self-Reducing Corset introduced a NEW IDEA that was practical. It met a crying demand never before satisfied. It provides complete hygienic support for the abdomen and the delicate organs contained therein. It reshapes and reduces surplus flesh. It actually decreases both the size and the weight of over-full figures.

The standardized Self-Reducing Corset, with exterior reducing straps, is made in a variety of models, most popular of which are Nos. 322, 324 and 326, with the elastic Nemo Lasticurve-Back. Made of stout material, well boned, and strong enough to control all heavy figures, these models are giving—and will give—complete corset-satisfaction to more than a million women.

Our new "Invisible" Self-Reducing Corset marks the COMPLETION of the Self-Reducing IDEA. It is a concession to women who want to enjoy all the hygienic features for which the Nemo is world-famous, but object to outside straps. The "Invisible" straps are concealed by the corset-skirt, but give the same complete support as the exterior straps.

The Comforters

"What's the Use of Worrying?"

By EDWARD BOLTWOOD

Copyright by Frank A. Munsey Co.

In the kitchen beneath Jernigan's bedroom the clock whirred and began to sound the hour. At the first jangling stroke Jernigan lifted his head and became aware, with a quick throb of gratitude, that he had been asleep. The question was, for how long? There was no daylight at the curtained window, but he was sure that it must be nearly sunrise, and in alert anxiety he counted the strokes of the clock.

Nine, ten, eleven—and silence. Jernigan groaned wearily. He had been in bed only thirty minutes, after all.

Through the doorway of the adjoining room, where his wife slept with the two children, he blinked at the white, dim hammock of Lizzie's back and listened to her placid breathing. Noiselessly he drew on some clothes, found a pair of slippers and glided swiftly down the dark stairway.

With a hand on the knob of the front door he turned and peered into his narrow parlor. The blue glare from an arc lamp in the street faintly illuminated the parlor table, revealing the bank book on it and his private account book and the sheets of paper covered with penciled figures. He hastily secreted them before he went out of doors.

* * * * * * *

Jernigan was the bookkeeper for Mr. Ellice at the Rudale mill, as his father had been before him. He was a skilled and honest accountant. The tormenting figures had nothing to do with his employer's affairs. They represented his own endeavor to deal with the terrible fact that during the past two years he had diminished by nearly $1,000 the modest capital which he had inherited from his parents.

He looked morosely down the deserted street toward the huge mill. Its windows glowed; its looms chanted their endless, sonorous hymn of prosperity. On a hill near by was the stately, old fashioned Ellice mansion, with its tall columns of white stone. Mr. Ellice was evidently entertaining an evening party there. The lamps of motorcars shot their golden beams over the lawn, and Jernigan heard a vagrant strain of dance music.

His vague plan was to stroll as far as the office of the mill before turning back.

Behind the building he halted in bewilderment. A light gleamed from a rear window. Somebody was in the office!

Now, it was impossible for Jernigan to believe that any one had rightful business there by night without his knowledge, so he crept close to the window. He saw a man standing beside the office table. On the table were books of account and sheets of paper covered with penciled figures. The man bent over them, then paced the room, then returned doggedly to the table, then paced the room again. Jernigan caught his breath, for the man was John Ellice.

The bookkeeper stared, as if in a theater, at a counterfeit presentment of himself pacing his own parlor. Ellice's unbuttoned coat showed a loose pajama jacket; he wore slippers, and his hair was ruffled like that of one driven from his bed. His face, as he bent at the table under the light, was drawn and white.

Jernigan interpreted the picture swiftly. Indeed, there was only a single possible meaning for him, and this was a meaning which swept everything else out of his simple soul as a gigantic and appalling torrent sweeps a humble valley. The sight of an Ellice of Rudale in the torment of financial worry was to a Jernigan what the sight of a collapse of the great pyramid would have been to an ancient Egyptian. Other affairs of life for Jernigan were totally obliterated by awe-stricken consternation and a sympathy almost reverent.

* * * * * * *

Ellice snapped off the electric lamp, pushed the papers into a drawer of the table and locked it. He decided that his daughter's dance would be over, and he wondered if he could sleep. Then he smiled grimly, knowing well enough that it was not dance music which had kept him awake. His mind continued sturdily, as if some[illegible] was perched on his shoulder.

His thoughts whirled back to the papers in the table drawer. Had he forgotten to jot down the loan from the Sanborn Trust? Of course he had. He began to compute the interest for the coming term. And what, in heaven's name, would be his next month's balance with the Atlas people? True, it might tide over this year, but— He threw open the outer door with a gesture of hopeless desperation and descended the steps.

"Who's that? Not Jernigan?"

"Yes, sir," faltered Jernigan. "If—if you can spare me a minute?"

"Why, certainly!"

Ellice managed to pull himself together. He glanced at his clerk's upturned coat collar and tremulous chin.

"You're not ill, Albert?"

"No, sir; just out for a little air."

"Quite right," approved Ellice. "Best thing in the world after a hard day's work. We're all right busy at Rudale now, eh? By Jove, it's fine to see the old concern more prosperous than ever! Well, what can I do for you?"

Jernigan was not deceived by his employer's labored nonchalance. The vision at the window had been too overpowering to allow of that. He cleared his throat diffidently.

"It's this way, Mr. Ellice. I have money, sir, to invest. Not much, of course, not over $12,000 or $15,000, but it's all my capital, and I—I'm worried about it, sir."

"Worried, Albert? You worried?"

Ellice darted a quick, suspicious glance at Jernigan's face, but the bookkeeper was gazing solemnly at the huge, clattering factory. The trustful look in his clerk's eye reminded Ellice of a confident child. For the moment Jernigan resembled a devotee in the presence of a benevolent idol.

"Your father, I understand, made safe investments," resumed Ellice. "Why not stick to them?"

"They don't suit me, sir," said the bookkeeper. "I was wondering if Rudale mill could use the money for awhile. I could turn it over to you tomorrow, and then I wouldn't have to worry any more."

Although conscious of an insane desire to laugh, Ellice was nevertheless curiously relieved. In his present mood, eager for any morsel of solace, he could convince himself that Jernigan knew almost as much about the financial condition of the Rudale mill as he did. And here was the bookkeeper desirous of placing all his money at the disposal of the plant. Ellice bit his lip. Was it possible that his own anxiety was ill founded, imaginary?

"Then I wouldn't have to worry any more," repeated Jernigan.

"No," Ellice murmured, "no. I suppose you wouldn't. Got plenty of faith in the old concern, have you, Albert?"

"Faith to burn, sir, as the boys say. Why, think of all the faith in the old mill there is in this town, Mr. Ellice! Think of the hundreds of men and women and children that trust in the mill, the same as they do that the sun shines! Gather all that trust in a lump, and a fellow would have a regular rock of comfort to stand on, wouldn't he?"

Ellice started queerly.

"I didn't know you were such a mystic," he rejoined in a changed voice.

"Excuse me, sir. I have notions, but that's only common sense. And about that money of mine?"

Without answering Ellice turned away thoughtfully, and the two strolled in silence to the wooden bridge that spanned the mill stream. They leaned on the rail, looking over the river. An hour ago Ellice had leaned on the same bridge rail and stared for a long time into the beckoning depths of that restful river. At the evil remembrance of that black hour he shuddered penitently and touched Jernigan's elbow beside him.

"Let your money stay where it is," he advised. "I can't believe that you have a right to worry, Albert. You've got the trust of your family to nerve you, just as I've got the trust of my mill hands and the village. We ought to stand on that trust and fight for it, both of us, oughtn't we? That's enough to keep us busy. Worrying's no good!"

"What bothers me," ventured Jernigan, "are the years to come—the future."

Ellice peeled a sliver from the rail and tossed it lightly on the surface of the shadowy current.

"That's the way the future takes us, I guess," said he. "It's up to us to keep afloat, that's all, and to hold the best course we can. The future? It's a big river, Jernigan, a big, big river. There's no map. Worrying won't help us to travel it."

"No, sir," muttered Jernigan.

For another minute they watched the stream as it glided steadily away into the mysterious darkness. Then Ellice glanced across the bridge at the great mill.

To the fancy of Ellice, with Jernigan's words ringing in his mind, the mill became a thing of life, a personal entity, radiant of confidence and trust. He felt, with a joyous thrill of regained manliness, that he would be worthy of its friendship and of the friendship of his people. He straightened his shoulders happily, as if they had been released from a painful burden.

"Good night," he said, "and thank you!"

"Thank me, sir? Why?"

"For a match," improvised Ellice, producing cigars from his pocket. "Will you smoke?"

"I think not," Jernigan declined. "It's late. Good night, sir!"

* * * * * * *

Although the street was quiet and deserted, while Jernigan hastened homeward under the elms it seemed to him alive with the mighty heart of all humanity, beating in unison with his own, vexed by the same solicitudes and conquering the same fears. As he passed each lowly cottage he thought of the humble men and women therein who faced the future with no different bravery from that required of kings and queens. If John Ellice could so dismiss anxiety over large affairs with such self reliant courage surely Jernigan could likewise surmount his infinitely smaller cares.

Unlatching his gate, he whistled a tune.

"Al Jernigan, where in the world"—

Lizzie paused to shield the flame of the candle as her husband opened the door.

"Why, I'd forgot to do an errand at the office. I meant not to disturb you, dear."

"But I didn't know what might happen, and I've worried like anything," she explained, smiling.

Jernigan yawned luxuriously.

"Never lend yourself trouble about what hasn't happened yet, Lizzie," said he. "What's the use of worrying?"

Quaint Old Harvard Rules.

Quaint rules and customs regulated class days at Harvard university in the seventeenth century, for in 1661 the overseers ordered that the president "from time to time commend it to the parents and guardians of the students that commence that they provide not above one gallon of wine for a student, judging it to be sufficient for that occasion." In 1693, "the corporation having been informed that the custom taken up in the college for the commencers to have plum cake is dishonorable to the college, not grateful to wise men and chargeable to the parents of the commencers, do therefore put an end to that custom." In 1727 a private commencement was determined upon and was observed for several years, but was not a success. The laws of 1734 provided that "no commencers shall have at his chambers any plum cake, plain cake or pies or hot meats of any kind except what is left of the dinner in the hall or any brandy, rum or distilled liquors or composition made with any of them."

Modern Necessities.

"One of the reasons for the cost of living," observes a wise clubman, "lies in the fact that people buy wholly unnecessary things. I had a conversation with the proprietor of a novelty shop in Fifth avenue a few days ago. A shiny object had attracted my attention, and I inquired about its use.

"'Those,' said the proprietor, 'are gilded pincers to pick up letters one has placed on the letter scales.'

"'And that ivory stick, carved and forked at the end?'

"'People use that to fish out things they have dropped into carafes.'

"'That square of morocco about the size of a nut; what is that for?'

"'That's a tampon—used to press down stamps after sticking them on envelopes.'

"'That ornamental box with a whole battery of little brushes?'

"'Those are to clean other brushes; brushes to clean hairbrushes, brushes to clean toothbrushes.'"—New York Post.

Stratagem Versus Perfidy.

The laws of war have always distinguished sharply between stratagem and perfidy. It is a legitimate stratagem to send bogus signals and telegraph messages and bogus dispatches or newspapers, to be intercepted by the enemy; to make use of the enemy's signals, bugle calls, watchwords and words of command or to clothe the men of a single unit in the uniform of several units, so that the prisoners and dead may give the idea of a large force. On the other hand, it is perfidy to take advantage of the enemy by deliberate lying or deception when there is a moral obligation to speak the truth. It would be perfidy, for instance, to pretend an armistice when none had been agreed on, to break a suspension of arms by surprise, to violate a safe conduct or any other truce or agreement, to fire on the enemy's uniform.—London Opinion.

The Red Sea Route.

When Napoleon invaded Egypt by way of Suez he attempted to cross the Red sea at the spot assigned by tradition to the crossing of the Children of Israel. He and his horsemen, however, seem, unintentionally, to have imitated Pharaoh rather than Moses, for they came very near to being drowned. According to French accounts, Napoleon saved his army by his presence of mind, ordering his cavalry to scatter in every direction to multiply the chances of coming on shallow water, and thus finding a line by which he and his people were extricated. The people of Suez, says Kinglake, declare that Napoleon lost his horse, got thoroughly submerged and was only fished ashore by the assistance of the natives.—London Standard.

Ancient Origin of Military Salute.

When did the military salute come into use? It certainly dates from the earlier half of the fifteenth century, says the St. James' Gazette. In the "Speculum Humanae Salvationis," which was issued before the invention of printing by movable types, there is an exceedingly quaint illustration in which Abraham is represented as saluting Melchisedec. The patriarch is in medieval armor and apparently on guard, and it would seem that Melchisedec is bringing him refreshments of water, and the salute is distinctly the military one still in use.

Bunkum.

Politicians are prone to talk "bunkum." And we so call it because when a member speaking in the United States congress was interrupted by the others coming he said: "Never mind. I'm talking to Buncombe," meaning Buncombe county, N. C., whence he came.

Not Too Early.

Father (sternly)—Elizabeth, you know I don't believe in early marriages. Daughter (aged eighteen, joyfully)—Why, mother do Harold and I, daddy? We've decided on high noon!—Puck.

Against His Will.

New Parson—And what is your husband, Mrs. Brown? Mrs. Brown—Well, sir, 'e isn't exactly a policeman, but 'e goes with 'em a good deal.—London Tatler.

Your Own Faults.

Most of us are quick enough at seeing what we have to put up with from others, but we forget what others have to put up with from us.

Each day is the scholar of yesterday.—Syrus.

Supposed Danger to the Eye.

Many people believe that certain modern illuminants are dangerous to the eyes on account of their ultra violet or actinic radiations. Dr. Louis Bell and Dr. F. B. Verhoeff have made an extensive investigation of the effects of radiation on the various parts of the eye, from the corneal epithelium back to the retina. In an article in Science the investigators report that no artificial source of light produces enough ultra violet radiation to be of the slightest danger to the eye. Such particular or injurious action as they have been able to detect experimentally from ultra violet rays is confined to a strictly limited region of the spectrum, and perfectly definite laws govern its quantity and effect. Actual experiments on the human eye show conclusively that no concentration of radiation on the retina from any artificial illuminant is great enough to produce injury under any practical conditions. Protective glasses are useful only, they conclude, in cutting off dazzling light.

Marriage in Japan.

A Japanese husband is allowed only one wife, but to marry is sometimes a much more serious matter than with us. Either the husband must be formally adopted into the family of the wife or the wife into the family of the husband, the couple being absorbed into one family and subject to its discipline. As a rule, this custom weighs more heavily on the bride than on the husband, for she must not only obey her husband, but every member of his family of an older generation than himself; hence a young woman often longs for old age, so that she may wield authority over the younger generations. To bring about a marriage in Japan an intermediary is appointed, whose duty it is to introduce the parties and to look to every arrangement of the wedding. He remains through life the guide, philosopher and friend of the married couple, who refer all matters, all misunderstandings to his counsel.—Pearson's.

Napoleon a Good Reader.

Napoleon not only read a great deal, but read with profit. His memory was extraordinary. Take, for instance, his knowledge of Roman civil law, long passages of which he once reeled off by heart to the astonishment of the state council engaged with him in the production of the Code Napoleon. To one of the councilors he explained how he gained his legal learning. When a young lieutenant he found in the cupboard of a prison room in which he was confined a ponderous tome of Roman law. "You can easily imagine," he said, "what a valuable prize that book was. When, at the end of ten days, I recovered my freedom I was saturated with Justinian and the Roman legal decisions." Napoleon added that the old book was covered with marginal notes—so much so that he could not have been idle if his imprisonment had "lasted a century."

The Country Newspaper.

I am ashamed to say that I had entertained a good humored tolerance, mingled with contempt, for country newspapers. They seemed to me the apotheosis of the little, the palladium of the uninteresting.

It did not occur to me that anything possessed of such tenacity of life as the country newspaper must have a real meaning and perform a genuine function in our civilization. In this roaring age of efficiency we do not long support any institution that does not set its claws deep into our common life—and hang on.—David Grayson in American Magazine.

Acute Pleasure.

Wife (returning from matinee)—Oh, it was too lovely! She had on a pale nile green silk, with bands of passementerie down the front and the grandest diamonds you ever saw, and when she died, in the last act, she rolled over four times, and every woman in the house was crying. I never enjoyed a play so much in my life.—Puck.

Her Nice Little Plan.

He—I don't believe your father will give his consent. I haven't got much, you know. She—That doesn't matter. The first month we can live on love, the second I'll begin to borrow things from mamma and about the third papa will get tired of it and come to the rescue.—London Telegraph.

Nice Neighbors.

"Touch neighborhood I live in. People steal everything I leave in my shed."

"Why don't you put a padlock on the door?"

"I put on a fine one, and somebody got it the first night."—Kansas City Journal.

The Remedy.

Aviator—I don't know the air currents up there. Friend—Then why not take a minister up with you? Aviator—A minister? Friend—Yes. Isn't he a sky pilot?—Baltimore American.

Sadly Aimed.

"Blinks always hits the nail on the head."

"Yes, but usually he drives it into the wrong place."—Philadelphia Ledger.

Recognized.

She—The waiter is hanging around as though he expected something. He—Oh, yes; he's a tippical waiter.—Providence Journal.

The crosses which we make for ourselves by overanxiety about the future are certainly not heaven sent.

Dufferin's Odd Right Eye.

Sir Thomas Barclay in "Thirty Years Anglo-French Reminiscences" tells how Lord Lytton once asked Lord Dufferin what he thought was the source of his success in conducting intercourse with eastern princes. "My glass eye," said he. "When I had anything serious to negotiate I fixed them with the glass eye and watched them with the other." He may, of course, have meant his monocle, adds Sir Thomas, who also describes the effect of Lord Dufferin's odd right eye upon himself:

"When he spoke to you he drooped his eyelids and fixed you with a steady gaze which made you feel as if you were giving yourself away to one who, by mental sympathy, would have. When you had finished what you were saying he would look on with you with the same steadiness as if he were listening now to what you were thinking. You would wriggle on the thin planks on to which in your confusion you had stepped, and then in the uncomfortable silence you would say something you did not intend, and Dufferin seemed to be waiting for that."

Fallers Called Mental Defectives.

According to a Brooklyn physician, most accidents, as well as divorces and crimes, are in reality due to defective mentality. When a person gets caught in a maze of traffic and does not know whether it is better to go backward or forward he is, according to this doctor, a target for everything coming his way.

The indecision or lack of judgment leads to frequent accidents with the same individual. Of 112 persons who were questioned in four semiprivate hospitals forty-six had had previous accidents and thirty-two more than one such accident. Out of about 50,000 examinations of defectives there was scarcely a case that did not show many scars. Inquiry among eight automobile owners showed that the opinion commonly held of reckless chauffeurs among their fellows was that the reckless ones were not quite normal, or, as they phrased it, were "crazy."—New York World.

The World's Strangest University.

Founded in the year 972 A. D., the Mohammedan university of El-Azhar ("The Luminous") is one of the oldest existing and strangest universities in the world.

El-Azhar is the Oxford of the Moslem world and is at present attended by upward of 10,000 students of all ages and from every eastern country from the Caucasus to Somaliland. Board and lodging is free. The teaching consists chiefly of Mohammedan dogma, which is laboriously committed to memory from sacred books.

The students squat in groups on the floor of the immense building with their boots—which have to be taken off on entering—and their daily rations beside them and accompany the droning repetition of their lessons with a rhythmic swaying of the body. Writing is done on tin slates.

Girls are allowed to attend the lectures, but only as listeners; they may not speak.

A Billion Dollars.

"I wonder if we realize when we talk of a billion dollars what an enormous sum of money it means. We all know how rapidly an expert counter of coins will manipulate them. You can scarcely follow the motion of his fingers as he shifts the coins from one pile to another and counts them. The treasury experts will count 4,000 silver dollars in an hour and keep it up all day long, but that is their limit.

"Working eight hours a day, then, an expert counter of coins will count 32,000 silver dollars in a day. But how long will it take him at that rate to count a million dollars? Thirty-one days. But that is only the beginning of the monstrosities of great figures. [illegible]

A Mother's Pride.

Pride, said Charles Dickens, is one of the seven deadly sins, but it cannot be the pride of a mother in her children, for that is a compound of two cardinal virtues—faith and hope.

Mountains You May Not Know.

I had imagined that the Rockies were the whole show. I had not the faintest recollection of the Cordilleran system of which the Rockies and all these other ranges are but a part; while, as for the Sierra Nevadas, I remembered them only when I came to them, and then much as one will recall a slight acquaintance who has been in jail for many years.

Are you shocked by my ignorance—or my confession of it? Then let me ask you if you know that the Uinta mountain range in Utah is the only range in the entire country that runs east and west? And have you ever heard of the Pequop mountains, or the Cedar mountains, or the Santa Rosas, or the Egans, or the Humboldts, or the Washoes, or the Gosintes, or the Toyabes, or the Toquimas, or the Hot Creek mountains? And did you know that in California, as well as in New Hampshire, there are White mountains? And what do you know of the Wasatch and Oquirrh ranges?—Julian Street in Collier's Weekly.
